

Character: Bill Sikes

Bill Sikes is in his thirties. He has a three-day -old beard and always wears the same dirty clothes: a black coat, filthy trousers, a brown hat, and a dirty handkerchief around his neck. We don't know much about his childhood or background, but we can assume that he grew up poor, somewhere in London.

We know that he is powerful and aggressive, and he often works with Fagin on various criminal activities. He has a bad reputation around town for being a very violent man, and Bill is willing to risk his life for the crime.

He lives in a dirty, broken house on an evil, narrow street, lit only by one lamp. Bill Sikes lives with Nancy and his white dog named Bulls Eye, which he both mistreats. Bill lost his life as he was being hunted down by the citizens of London. Then he made a big mistake, when he accidentally hanged himself as he was trying to escape.

A memorial moment:

For us, a memorial moment of Bill was when he accidentally hanged himself from the chimney of Fagin's house with a rope. This scene was very dramatic, as the dog jumps after Bill Sikes and loses his life.
